The rise and fall of oligophosphate metabolism. Myosin, actin, actomyosin and adenosine triphosphatase (ATPase) are the four major classes of proteins that are phosphorylated in the sarcomere or myofibrillar space of striated muscle cells. The polyphosphate chain of each of these four proteins is a branched chain of up to 50 phosphate groups attached to a nucleotide diphosphate which is composed of a triad of adenosine 5'-triphosphate (ATP) and two triads of ribose 1-2 phosphate. Intermediates in the formation of the polyphosphate chain of these proteins are adenosine phosphate, inosine phosphate and cyclic diadenosine monophosphate, and glycerophosphate, and triphosphate. Recent evidence suggests that there may be a chain terminating enzyme present which dephosphorylates ATP to ribose 1-2 phosphate. This hypothesis is supported by the recent discovery of a lysine amino acyltransferase which is inhibited by ATP and actin which is inhibited by ATP and actin. This catalytic enzyme catalyzes the adenosine phosphates moiety. Two alternative pathways for the turnover of oligophosphates have been described as either the adenosine phosphate pathway or the pyrophosphate pathway. In most cases there is little direct evidence for any obligatory role for either of these in vivo. The role of cyclic diadenosine monophosphate in controlling the muscle contraction is well known but its effect on phosphorylating ribosomal proteins is still being investigated. Cyclic diadenosine monophosphate has also been reported to affect the adenylate cyclase system. Pyrophosphate is probably the major route for the degradation of ATP in rat skeletal muscle and this is catalyzed by the sarcoplasmic reticulum ATPase. In addition, there is some evidence that the pyrophosphate pathway is the major route for breakdown of ATP in human skeletal muscle.Ultrafiltration membrane with size exclusion property as a tool in cell separation. With the application of nanotechnology, the membranes used for cell separation have been gradually developed, and novel material-based nanofiltration (NF) and ultrafiltration (UF) membranes with the size exclusion property are significantly different from traditional thin-film composite (TFC) membranes and poly
