opioidergic drugs on spinal reflexes and natural behaviours in rats. The effect of the dopaminergic drug nomifensine, the serotonergic drugs citalopram and fluoxetine, and the opioidergic drugs morphine and naloxone on nociceptive reflexes and natural behaviours was investigated in rats. The levels of flexor- and extensor reflex components of the natural flexor-extensor response (E-M, E-P and M-P reflexes) were measured during flexor and extensor stimulations applied to the skin over the lumbar region. A significant reduction of the E-M reflex was observed during slow, but not fast, flexor stimulations. During slow stimulation, the E-P reflex was reduced more significantly than the E-M reflex. Citalopram and fluoxetine, which are specific serotonin reuptake inhibitors, produced a transient attenuation of the E-M and E-P reflexes, and a prolonged reduction of the E-M reflex during slow stimulations. Morphine induced a similar reduction of the E-M reflex. Naloxone alone produced a shortlasting reduction of the E-M reflex and reduced the E-M reflex more significantly in combination with morphine. The use of long-lasting stimulations (1 and 5 min), increased the sensitivity to weak stimuli. The E-P reflex during 1 min stimulations was not significantly reduced by morphine, but by naloxone in combination with morphine. The slow, long-lasting stimulations produced a decrease of the spontaneous head-shaking behaviour. Both morphine and naloxone induced a similar reduction of the spontaneous head-shaking behaviour. The present results, together with our previous findings that, in the same experimental conditions, the E-
