“I am very hard to find for when I am lost,” said the old man. “I can solve all sorts of problems for any one who will listen to me.” You sit astride the old man’s back in his small kingdom, a dark velvet cape matching your black robes. The old man ferries you from place to place, on a journey to gather a collection of the most evil of sinners. But first, you would like his advice. “Yours is a terrific cape. What do you call it?” “Death Robes,” the old man answered. “No, the other thing.” “The Death Robes.” “So what is it?” “I thought everyone knew that it was called a Death Cape.” “No, it’s called a Death Robe.” “I call it a Death Cape,” the old man shouted suddenly. “God, very well then. I do not understand why all the elves over there are holding you up.” The old man holds his hand over your mouth and stands on a long platform as his heels touch the ground. He glides to one side as you run, jumping off the ground and into the old man’s hand. Your cloak falls open, revealing a black robe. “I love this cape. It’s very comfortable,” he says, and runs down the stairs, jumping down the towers of a fortress. You disembark the old man, running ahead to a side of the castle. Your cloak falls open, revealing a black cape. You miss the vague figure of a man as you run past, and tumble to the ground. A guard runs into the open space, and you silently crawl over to the stables. In the stable, you find a bucket of blood with a goblet in it. The bucket rattles slightly as a voice comes from the stables. “Every day, the five lowest peasants in town are pushed into the rapids of the river.

Can you really predict the winner of an eSports tournament? Sure, you can theorize who will win based on the history of the particular competition, but in a scenario like the Intel Extreme Masters, which is a full blown tournament with multiple teams from all over the world, one might think it impossible to predict who will win until the big day. At first, this seems like a claim that we would normally scoff at. After all, you can't predict the winner of a
