Some commentators, especially neoconservatives, have argued that the neocons were responsible for the “democratization” of Iraq in 1991. While there is some truth to this, the best explanation for the new political culture that emerged in Iraq is the Iraq Liberation Act... in The New York Times, “Waging an All-Out War Against Iraq,” 3 October 2002,... the Iraq Liberation Act had the Iraq government outlawed to the extent that the policy of regime change was not a “viable” option... On 5 October 2002, the day after the vote in the US Senate, the White House press office issued a statement by Tony Snow, the president's press secretary, that in fact the United States had had no policy of regime change in Iraq before the Iraqi leadership "first acted with armed force to rid their country of foreign occupation.".. The White House also warned that the war would not be "prolonged"; the US military action would be "limited" and would involve no "boots on the ground".. Some of the most outspoken advocates of war against Iraq argued that the war had no “viable” policy alternative if they were dissatisfied with the result of the war in Afghanistan...

---

On April 5, 2003, President Bush issued a secret directive entitled “Regime Change in Iraq”... the Bush administration made it clear that it opposed regime change in Iraq by convincing the new Iraqi government not to hold the December election and by approving the actions of the military in Northern Iraq... after Iraqi, democratic elections were held in January 2005, The New York Times described the new rule of law that took place in Iraq as follows: “the war of the past two years against Saddam Hussein has destroyed Iraq in ways that the United States and the international community did not foresee and cannot easily reverse, undermining the best of the country’s long-held political and civic traditions and intensifying sectarian divides that threaten not only Iraq’s political future but also the rest of the Middle East.”.. it is clear that opposition to the
