Substance P induces changes of neurotransmitter and immunoreactive substance P content of rat basal forebrain. The effects of substance P (SP) on the levels of acetylcholine (ACh), dopamine (DA), norepinephrine (NE), and serotonin (5-HT) and also on the SP immunoreactivity (irSP) in the basal forebrain (BF) of male Sprague-Dawley rats were studied by microdialysis in vivo and in situ hybridization histochemistry in vitro. Microdialysis was performed in the BF region after a continuous infusion of SP (0.5-16 microg/ml) for 1 h. In situ hybridization histochemistry was carried out by infusion of SP (1.8×10^{-6} mol/l) over 1 h. The results from both experiments indicate that SP alters neurotransmitter and immunoreactive SP content. The ACh content increased after infusion of 4.0 and 8.0 microg SP/ml, respectively. At infusion of 1.2 microg SP/ml, the NE content increased significantly (PMy latest project is to run a 2X8 board of significance of plasma selenium and zinc in a group of depressive patients. Selenium is known to be essential for many physiological processes in the body, including protecting the thyroid and the immune system, and plasma selenium concentrations decrease with age. To investigate selenium and zinc plasma concentrations in depressive patients. We studied 73 consecutive depressed patients and 29 age- and sex-matched healthy controls. Thyroid-stimulating hormone was measured, and plasma selenium and zinc levels were determined by hydride generation atomic absorption spectrophotometry. Selenium and zinc plasma levels were significantly lower in depressed patients compared with controls. This reduction of both selenium and zinc was more pronounced in severely depressed patients than in those with mild to moderate depression. Zinc plasma levels correlated negatively with the BDI score in severely depressed patients. Patients who died within the first year after the onset of depression, and who had first presented with hypothyroidism, had significantly lower plasma selenium levels than nondepressed patients. The incidence of hypothyroidism did not differ between severely and mildly depressed patients. Results suggest that depressive patients have a subclinical hypothyroid state in which selenium concentrations are reduced. Selenium may be related to the pathogenesis of depression, although selenium's role in the mechanism of thyroid hormone depletion in depressed patients remains to be elucidated. In addition, plasma selenium concentrations may be related to the prognosis of depression, but future controlled studies are needed to investigate the clinical implication of this finding.[From sputum antibodies to pneumococcal vaccines]. Serological examination of sputum for antibodies to capsular polysaccharides of Streptococcus pneumoniae are of great interest to identify the causative bacteria in order to establish an appropriate treatment regimen. Newer immunological tests now allow for screening of large numbers of samples.
