Magnetic resonance (MR) imaging is increasingly used for glucose monitoring. However, MR interference can cause noise or artifact in the acquired readouts. For this reason, custom, MR-compatibility needs to be considered to achieve acceptable repeatability. A pilot scale investigational device was developed with consideration of MR compatibility and validated. It was found that with modulation frequency of 1.0 MHz and amplitude of 17 mT, the glucose sensor response could be maintained while the noise and artifact level was kept low. In addition, it was feasible to transmit the glucose reading to the remote wireless receiver for visual display on the skin surface, eliminating the requirement of a separate electronic module. This study gives a guideline to ensure MR compatibility and the performance of a magnetic resonance scanner in glucose monitoring. With further optimization, such devices could serve as efficient, noninvasive, inexpensive, and reusable glucose sensors.. "We'll go to restaurants in the city. It'll be a special moment. We go to movies. We go to the museum. We go to games. We go to concerts. That's our amusement." Robyn Davidson had many things to accomplish in her life, but she kept a clear eye on one thing. "I knew I wanted to dance and I wanted to do that," she said. So she did. Always. Long live Robyn. John C. Hallman, LMSW, is director of counseling services at South Central Behavioral Health.
